Celebrating Trishna and 360

10 September, 2011 | By Wendy Mitchell

My favourite party* of Toronto so far was the classy soiree at Brassaii last night combining celebrations for Fernando Meirelles' 360 and Michael Winterbottom's Trishna.

Guests dined on lamb chops and grilled cheese sandwiches and drank copious amounts of vodka, including some delicious fruity cocktails named after BlackBerrys (the company that hosted the whole night). The 'Bold' had a nice basil twist.

It was a pretty great idea to have a two-film post-premiere party, adding to a more interesting crowd — guests were invitees from Revolution Films, eOne, Wild Bunch (which is selling 360), and Bankside (which is selling Trishna). The fact that both films had very positive reactions at their world premieres last night also added to the happy mood.

Andrew Eaton of Revolution Films was producer on both titles, and told me he brought along his wife to make sure he didn't celebrate too much. But surely having two world premieres in one night calls for all hours of partying!

My only complaint was the too-loud cheesy music (yes, I do sound like a geriatric, but I'm trying to schmooze, not dance.)
